TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1859.

THE SECRET DIARY OF AN EMPRESS. "The days when Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, "by a Person of Honor, and Roman-ces of M. Scudier, done into English by a Science—a handsome quarto volume, illustrated Person of Quality, was attractive to readers and profitable to book sellers, have long gone by." So wrote the Great Essayist and whatever the possessor of it does, says, thinks, feels, has still a mysterious charm not only for that class of feeble minds which admire the productions of George Gorden Byron, simply because he was a Lord, and what great people—whether great by virtue of intrinsic meritor by the accident of position—do, how they think, and how they feel.—

There is a vague notion that an insight into the mental and moral nature of such people illustified moral nature of such people. will unfold the secret of greatness and ena-

mains with us

"Memoirs de l'Imperatrice Catherine II., ecrits par ellememe, et precedes d'une preface par A. Herzen," lately published in London by Trubner, will have a most successful run, especially if it be done into English, by a Person of Quality. We all know who the Empress Catherine of Russia was. Schoolboys can recite the story of that crafty, bold, cruel, intriguing "Mes ilina of the North," whose crimes surpassed the crimes of the Borgias, and whose licentiousness was such that Lord Brougham says, "the soldiers of the guard were at last detailed to fatigue an appetite which nothing could satiate."-We now behold her in a new attitude, as a young girl newly introduced into a profligate Court, practicing the craft which finally led her to the throne, just beginning that career of intrigue which ended in practices the most unnatural and abhorrent, and chronicling. unwittingly it would seem, her own shame. For, in the very breath with which she naively details her intrigues, she represents hernelf as the meekest, most submissive, patient, long suffering and abused of women, and the sentence which narrates the tortures she endured, contains a frank statement of the arts she practiced to win that favor which ultimately secured to her the sceptre of all the Russias. How M. Herzen obtained the Imperial MS. it is impossible to say. Enough for us toknow that it bears internal evidence of authenticity. It is valuable for the insight it gives of Court life, and of the early character of Catharine, showing plainly that "the girl was mother to the woman." She came to Moscow in 1774, a German Princess, so poor that she had only a dozen chemises, no sheets of her own, and only two or three described succintly, as "a sot, a simpleton, and sickly," a drunkard at ten years old, fond of English beer and oysters, a hater of church, a lover of the histories of highway robbers, fond of dogs, and blessed with a decided genius for puppets. He kept his wife, the good, innocent Catharine, awake all night by playing on the fiddle, and by whipping his hounds until they howled in unison office.

with his instrument. Catherine represents Hope him as irredeemably bad, and hideously ugly after the small-pox. Yet he confided implicitly in his wife, and told her everything he knew.

mother the Empress Elizabeth, being then in power. Catharine tells us that one of the first presents she received after reaching Moscow, was a rouge-pot. This to a girl fifteen years old! The Empress and all her ladies derer Song, by Shubert; the Annen Polka, by retain this valuable remedy. A supply received were in the habit of getting drunk—"there Strauss, and the Cradle Song as sung by Jenny and for sale by J. A. MILBURN, Apothecary. was nothing but intrigue and drink to relieve the stately tedium of daily duties." Every All the M body was a spy on everybody else; the ladies of the court were forced to send billet-doux to their lovers through the hands of a jeweller and fiddler. Cholic, from over-eating and drinking, was a common complaint. The principal amusement of the Court was masquerading-the men dressing in women's clothes and the women in men's, the Empress herself setting the example. This did not suit the men, who found petticoats very troublesome to manage; nor did it suit the women who were of bad shape. In this atmosphere Catherine lived many years, playing the angel in sweetness and submission, writing hard to please, spending half her income on a single fete to gratify the public, putting up as best she could with the caprices of her foolish husband, pretending to unbounded piety, and sustained through all her tritas, as she tells us, "by a something she didn't exactly know what, which never permitted her for a single moment to doubt every thing else in the Book and Periodical line. that she would at last come to be Imperatrice Souveraine de Russie." She studies hard, reads Cicero, Voltaire, Plutarch and Montesquein, and can bear everything but pimples on her face. She weeps much. Every little loss sets her to weeping. At Court they pity her innocence and laugh at her softness .--And this was the bloody and lustful Catherine for her husband in the shape of a son, the future Emperor Paul. Afterwards comes a daughter. Peter exclaims, "je ne sais pas trop sicet en fant est a moi," but is well content with 60,000 roubles as a present.—

number—contains The Wanderers Song, by Shubert; The Aurora Polka, (the most popular Polka of the day) by J. Strauss, and The Cradle Song as sung by Jenny Lind—price ten cents. mh 26 Catherine give the names of her lovers, and DREMIUM PIANO FORTES .- Just received tells many of their antics. The diary ends just before the assassination of Peter, by which Pianes, also in store Knabe & Co's, justly celebra-Catherine was made Empress. It is a terrible record of crime and licentiousness, but it may serve to remind us of the purer times in which we live, and make us grateful that we at the lowest Factory Cash prices. enjoy a Republic and not a Despotism .--
